This was decided yesterday, when about forty of the cancelsts met in the office of Major Pullman and listened to the plan advanced by Wilbert E. Longfellow, of the first-aid department of the National Red Cross.

Part of Mr. Longfellow's plan is to arouse city-wide interest in the campaign to reduce the number of drownings. With this as his object, he has planned stereopticon lectures for the next few days. The first of these lectures will be held tomorrow night building or in the rooms of the Champer of Commerce. The second lecture will be held Saturday night at one of the boot houses near the Aqueduct bridge. Both lectures will be open to the public.

To Teach Life-Saving.

Each day this week Mr. Longfellow will give special instructions in lifesaving work at the Municipal bathing beach. He will devote Sunday to a tour of the canoe clubs and camps along the shores of the upper river, giving practical demonstrations before the members of each.

Those who attended yesterday's meeting were enthusiastic over Mr. Long-fellow's plan of organization. It is his object to enlist as many canocists principles of the drama which were to instruct rather than amuse.

"It is a feature of the modern movement in the theater." Miss Clayton said, when some one asked her about her reasons for producing the play, "that a large class of people ask for something real and vital in their amusements. Sliapstick farce or the eternal triangle no longer satisfy a large section of the public. They wish to be amused and to have their emotions stirred, but at the same time there must be some basis of scrious meaning beneath the dramatic offering. Those who have the interest of humanity at stake have been quick to take advantage of the new tendency, and we find now in all branches of the theater, entire plays or single scenes which are obviously intended to leave an aftermath of thought.
